The elderly are more likely to have complex health needs than younger adults; attention to their total health care needs can be difficult for both primary care providers and the public. The Population Research Center at the University of Pennsylvania is awarding this grant to conduct a study of physical function and physical activity among older adults in variously defined health conditions. This

3-year study will examine the role of physical function and physical activity in mediating the effects of physical health on physical function and health-related quality of life among older adults with chronic illness. A mixed methods approach will be employed, which includes a cross-sectional telephone survey of 12,000 individuals 65 and older and a prospective longitudinal cohort study in which 300 of the survey participants will be followed longitudinally over 2 years. The specific aims of the study are as follows: (1) to determine whether and to what extent physical function and physical activity moderate the effect of physical illness on health-related quality of life;(2) to examine the effects of physical function and physical activity on health-related quality of life, both cross-sectionally and prospectively;(3) to determine whether and to what extent physical function and physical activity mediate the effects of physical illness on health-related quality of life;and (4) to examine the
