The study was conducted by a team of investigators in Winnipeg, Canada, led by Dr. David Borchelt of the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg. The study looked at a large group of deceased people with mild to severe cases of the brain condition, determined by the presence of brain changes on scans, and found that the protein seen in patients with Alzheimer's had indeed been present in the brains of those who had died of a brain injury. This means that to the older brain, a bit like a cassette tape that was never erased or overwritten, the in-flowing information is still there. Of course, that means that if you are a baby, the information is not there for you to be able to access. This study could affect the way doctors diagnose Alzheimer's and other similar diseases later in life. Scientists now think that Alzheimer's progresses slowly and invisibly in its early stages and may take up to 40 years to completely destroy a person's brain. About this time, study author Dr. David Borchelt adds, "early-stage Alzheimer's may be difficult to diagnose because patients may not be exhibiting all the common signs of Alzheimer's," such as memory loss, problems in planning, language and reasoning, impaired judgment, and changes in physical health. During the early stages of the disease, there may not be obvious signs of Alzheimer's disease. In this early stage, the disease is insidious and is silent, and may not even be detected until much later. Given the cognitive differences between the early and late stages of the disease, this does present a challenge for diagnosis. The study team tested brain samples from the Manitoba Brain Bank for the presence of amyloid plaques,
